Putting the recruit back into recruitment

For the past few years, candidates seeking a new role and clients seeking assistance in assessment and selection of new staff have faced a common challenge: finding quality recruitment professionals who can meet their needs.

Recruitment Academy aims to fill this gap. Formed earlier this year by well-known recruitment industry identity Michael Dimopoulos, Recruitment Academy offers a service that's distinctly different from the rest. Dimopoulos has utilised his 10 years of experience working for various global recruitment organisations to recognise this major gap in the industry and acted on it with a brand new concept.

Dimopoulos himself has had the experience of building a career in recruitment from the position of a green outsider. With no tertiary qualifications, yet a driving ambition to work in the corporate sector, the recruitment industry provided the opportunity and earning potential where few other industries did.

"Today clients expect their recruitment consultant to be business-savvy, trained in all types of interviewing methodology and knowledgeable about many industry types. That type of background is hard to get on the job, and meanwhile clients are paying the price for consultants' inexperience," he says.

Recruitment Academy offers induction and training courses for candidates entering the recruitment industry in every state. Dimopoulos believes that a key challenge facing recruitment firms is maintaining service quality in such a buoyant employment environment. Recruitment
